

Bachelor of General Studies (BGS)

What is a Bachelor of General Studies degree?

The General Studies curriculum provides flexibility to allow the student's program to adapt to particular interests, background, time limitations, and ultimate career goals. It is especially appropriate for a mature person who has, as result of various educational and work experiences, a clear focus and strong commitment to a particular course of study. You can choose a degree concentration that integrates coursework with your interests such as: Arts and Communication, Computer & Natural Science, Social Science and Professional Studies.

Why a BGS degree?

- You have completed classes for a certain major, but are no longer pursuing that degree plan.
- You have completed a wide variety of courses perhaps at a variety of institutions and want your courses to count towards a degree plan.
- You want to achieve your career goals faster (for example working towards teaching alternate certification).
- You prefer an interdisciplinary course of study rather than something more specific.
- Your current employer requires a college degree for upward mobility.
- You want a flexible degree program that lets you choose a variation of classes that are interesting and meaningful to you.
- The career fields that are of interest to you may not require a certain major or degree.

Job-seeker Information:

Find what you want to do:

1. Consider your interests (ex. courses you like)
2. Figure out what you like to do (ex. academic and extracurricular activities)
3. Take an interest and skills assessment: <http://www.typefocus.com>
4. Research the job market (see Additional Resources below)
5. Get help: Counseling and Career Services, Sylvan Friedman Student Union, Rm. 305, 318-357-5621

Consider Internships: obtain relevant work experience and possibly get paid (www.internships.com).

How to Find a Job:

1. Networking enable one to make connections with people you already know or are just meeting to assist with job search efforts. One should consult friends, family, co-workers, and even professors for help. There may be job opportunities found by speaking with alumni, those in professional associations, and conference attendees. Once your network is expanded so are your career opportunities.
2. Career fairs enable job seekers to get information about several companies at once. You may be able to submit a resume and even interview on the spot. It is very important to come prepared with several copies of your resume, unofficial transcript(s), and business apparel. Many employers contact the university directly to recruit students for their company. Not only do universities hold career fairs, but local entities may offer these. It is best to find out which employers will be there so that you can research the companies, their history and culture, open positions, and requirements. These events can even help you narrow down your proposed job field or improve your interviewing skills.
3. Job Postings are usually on the internet with popular websites such as: www.careerbuilder.com, www.monster.com, www.indeed.com, etc. They can even be found in more traditional formats such as the newspaper or professional publications.
